 of course find space for soloists every now and then! Of which there are many top contenders in SJO! They must be contained. :-)

Actually (for the recording only, of course) most of the drums in the ensemble-pieces were recorded in two stages. First I played something quite simplistic with the ensemble so they would become carriers of "my" beat, as I later would erase my original drums and record them anew, now able to take more chances - and not the least - take more pauses - where I normally would have to "keep the beat".

The other element of inspiration came from my affection and deep respect for "real" classical music. Many of the melodic elements bear witness to this. The concert originally has 9 parts, about 85 minutes playing time, but only half found it's way to this album. There are not many lengthy improvisations, but the idea was after all to interpret the different parts to perfection. Maybe that is why mastering engineer (and sparring partner in this recording) Bob Katz branded the music "classical". Well, maybe it is. The classical "everything written" approach was familiar to many of the musicians, and overall equalled out the roles in the band. We did consistently weaves his magic, but there again, as a leader, he does have four wands to wave as opposed to the traditional one. PoliturPassiarer is impressive, ambitious music, pioneering and peerless.

SJO commissioned this work in 2013, full concert length. I set out to make a stack of small "études"; practicing-tools to further strengthen the rhythmic connections in this 13-piece ensemble, consisting of both classically trained musicians and jazz musicians.

My first idea was to compose/arrange both rhythmically and harmonically what goes on "inside" my drum-set; the different patterns and moves that spread out between two arms and two legs. The instruments besides the drums) would then act as a sort of a "large ensemble drummer" and do much of the work the drummer traditionally does, so allowing me to move more freely around in the compositions. It was a lot of fun to think, plan and play this way, and it did wonders for the orchestra's ability to communicate tightly and clearly on stage.

 Über-percussionist Kleive orchestrates. It's what he does. Whether playing in an ultra-improvisational duet setting or in tightly and specifically composed pieces for 13 musicians such as on this CD, his four extraordinarily individual and agile limbs create percussive poetry.

This is the second Losen Records release to feature the excellent Scheen Jazzorkester (the first was this year's Fjon featuring Rune Klakegg). To quote the Scheen Jazzorkester website concerning PoliturPassiarer, "These are very complex works, which make unusual demands on both the rhythmic precision and virtuosity of the band."

The music is largely scored but there is intermittent space for soloists such as saxophonist André Kassen, heard to such great effect on the recently released Losen Records album, Pomona and veteran Guttorm Guttormsen, also on soprano sax.

Audun has worked with international giants such as Mike Mainieri, Charles Lloyd, Marilyn Mazur, Mike Stern and Pat Metheny, and homegrown giants such as Terje Rypdal, Jon Balke, Nils Petter Molvær, Jan Bang and Sidsel Endresen to name but a few. However he performs with, Audun Kleive
